Based on a scientific analysis of potentially violent radicalization processes and events in Germany, MOTRA makes a contribution to improving evidence-based policy-making and practice. The MOTRA cutting-edge research network brings together nine institutional partners from renowned universities and non-university research institutes as well as from various scientific disciplines. MOTRA seeks cooperative dialog at eye level with other scientific research associations as well as network partners from practice and politics thus pursuing two central objectives:

1. Monitoring

MOTRA aims to establish a monitoring system to continuously observe politically and/or religiously motivated radicalization processes and events in Germany on a broad data basis. The aim is to better capture the spread, development trends and constellations conducive to extremism and radicalization. We use different methodological approaches to investigate the underlying causal structures and dynamics. This is done with prognostic and preventive intentions. The aim is to use this improved empirical basis to identify the conditions and turning points at which an originally legitimate and legal – but also potentially radical – protest changes in the direction of unrestricted, politically extremist, unconstitutional and possibly violent or criminal activities.

2. Knowledge Transfer

MOTRA is also pursuing the development and establishment of a multifunctional exchange platform to facilitate a more direct transfer of knowledge between the fields of scientific research, social practice and policy-making. On this platform, empirical findings and knowledge, both from MOTRA's own research as well as evidence from other research networks and fields of practice, on the background, causes and consequences of specific and new radicalization phenomena, are to be communicated and exchanged in a timely manner.

The complexity of the subject area “radicalization and political extremism” and the associated challenges for science, practice and politics require a cooperative interaction that goes beyond individual disciplines, fields of work or institutions. Based on the conviction that the prevention of radicalization processes, potentially leading to violence and possibly political extremism, is a task for society as a whole, MOTRA sees itself as an open forum for exchange.

MOTRA is open to all actors from research and practice from a wide range of fields of action as well as state and civil society institutions who see themselves connected through their common interest in the research and practice issues brought into focus by MOTRA.
